In his memoir My Boyhood Days, Tagore writes that he did not enjoy going to school since it practised strict discipline. He thought it did not allow children to dream.

Tagore hated the boundaries of the four walls of the classroom. He was very reluctant to attend school. When he was in school he stared out of the window and was drawn to nature- the shade of the trees, the lush green grass, the pond, the banyan tree. After his mother's death Tagore completely ignored school education. Thus began his home tutoring. Free from the boundaries of the classroom, Tagore read a lot books and became a knowledge able person.

His childhood experience of school education resulted in the establishment of Visva Bharati. Here students attend classes in the lap of nature. Visva Bharati encourages the practice of teaching under the tree shades and the process of learning from nature.
